

Causes of the Russian Revolution Activity

Goal: to understand WHY people in Russia wanted to have a revolution.

Part 1: Czar Nicolas II's Government: Overview. Take notes on based on the reading.

Czar's rise to power
Russo-Japanese War
Unrest in Russia & Revolution of 1905

Part 2: Character Profile: Whom do you represent? _____

Read your character profile.

1. Draw a picture of your character. Think of how his/her living conditions/beliefs might make him/her look. Make sure you include:
 - Color
 - Off to the side of the person, write a description of what they might be sensing (each of the 6 things in the box to the right must be included)

1. See—point to eyes
2. Hear—point to ears
3. Say—point to mouth
4. Feel—point to heart
5. Do—point to hands
6. Walk/journey—point to feet

2. Complete a daily schedule for your character using the information in the character profile. You will need to be creative with some of the information. Just stay as accurate as possible.

Morning
Afternoon
Evening

3. Write a letter of complaint from your character to Nicholas II. Your letter should include:

- 1st Paragraph:
 - detailed description of what is wrong in Russia
 - Explanation of why you think the czar/government is responsible
- 2nd Paragraph:
 - At least 3 reasons why you think you would be better off with a different government.

Dear Czar Nicholas II,

Sincerely,

Part 3: Notes on the unrest in Russia before the Revolution.

Workers	Peasants	Soldiers

Czar Nicolas II's Government: Overview

As a child, Nicholas II received his education through a string of private tutors. While Nicholas II excelled in history and foreign languages, ironically, the future leader struggled to comprehend the subtleties of politics and economics. To make matters worse, his father failed to provide him with much training in affairs of state. Nicholas succeeded to the throne following his father's death from liver disease on 20th October, 1894. Reeling from the loss, and poorly trained in affairs of state, Nicholas II hardly felt up to the task of assuming his father's role. In fact, he confessed to a close friend, "I am not prepared to be a czar. I never wanted to become one. I know nothing of the business of ruling."

Later that month he married the German princess, Alexandra of Hesse-Darmstadt. Alexandra, the grand-daughter of Queen Victoria, was a strong believer in the autocratic power of the czar and urged him to resist demands for political reform.

Russo-Japanese War

Although he described himself as a man of peace, he favored an expanded Russian Empire. The Czar made plans to expand into Manchuria and Korea. In 1891, construction on the Trans-Siberian railroad had begun, connecting Russia with the Pacific Coast. As a result, Japan felt increasingly threatened.

In 1904 Japan attacked Russia. On 8th February, 1904, the Japanese Navy launched a surprise attack on the Russian fleet at Port Arthur. In December of that year, Nicholas II's army was forced to surrender Port Arthur. Although the Russian Army was able to hold back Japanese armies along the Yalu River and in Manchuria, the Russian Navy fared badly.

The war was unpopular with the Russian people and demonstrations took place in border areas such as Finland, Poland and the Caucasus. Failure to defeat the Japanese in the Russo-Japanese War also reduced the prestige of the Czar and his government. By spring of 1905, his fleet was decimated in the Battle of Tsushima. In the wake of Russia's defeat, Nicholas II entered peace negotiations with Japan that summer.

Unrest in Russia

Nicholas II also faced mounting domestic problems. The Russian industrial employee worked on average an 11 hour day (10 hours on Saturday). Conditions in the factories were extremely harsh and little concern was shown for the workers' health and safety. Attempts by workers to form trade unions were resisted by the factory owners, and in 1903, a priest, Father Georgi Gapon, formed the Assembly of Russian Workers. Within a year it had over 9,000 members.

1904 was a particularly bad year for Russian workers. Prices of essential goods rose so quickly that real wages declined by 20 percent. When four members of the Assembly of Russian Workers were dismissed at the Putilov Iron Works, Gapon called for industrial action. Over the next few days over 110,000 workers in St. Petersburg went out on strike.

The Revolution of 1905

In an attempt to settle the dispute, Georgi Gapon decided to make a personal appeal to Nicholas II. He drew up a petition outlining the workers' sufferings and demands. This included calling for a reduction in the working day to eight hours, an increase in wages, an improvement in working conditions and an end to the Russo-Japanese War. When the procession of workers reached the Winter Palace, it was attacked by the police and palace guards. Over 100 workers were killed and some 300 wounded. The incident, known as Bloody Sunday, started what became known as the Revolution of 1905. Strikes took place all over the country and the universities closed down when the whole student body complained about the lack of civil liberties by staging a walkout. Lawyers, doctors, engineers, and other middle-class workers established the Union of Unions and demanded a constituent assembly. Ultimately the Revolution of 1905 ended with the establishment of a limited constitutional monarchy, yet the czar soon disregarded these limits.

Character Profile: Workers

Source 1:

After [the Revolution of] 1905, Russian industrialization made great and rapid progress. Foreign trade grew rapidly. The wages and the savings of the workers also increased. The workers had a better chance to receive education. From 1905 to 1909 there were fewer strikes and the active membership of the revolutionary groups also declined. But increased prosperity, by making the struggle for existence easier, led the workers to think more of meaningful existence—a prosperous living and political reform.

But the workers had other grievances. Trade unions were still strictly controlled. Strikes were regarded as illegal. Few factory laws were passed to improve the poor working conditions of the workers. As a result, some workers held secret meetings to discuss revolutionary ideas. In the two and a half years before the outbreak of the Great War, there were more than six thousand strikes.

Source 2:

Russia's lower class workers had faced a dire economic situation. Most of them were working 11 hour days. Health and safety provisions were dismal, and wages were falling. There were numerous strikes and protests as time went on. Almost all of these were either ignored by Nicholas or broken up, often in a violent and deadly fashion.

Source 3:

Workers also had good reasons for discontent: overcrowded housing with often deplorable sanitary conditions, long hours at work (on the eve of the war a 10-hour workday six days a week was the average and many were working 11 ½ hours a day by 1916), constant risk of injury and death from very poor safety and sanitary conditions, harsh discipline (not only rules and fines, but foremen's fists), and inadequate wages. The rapid industrialization of Russia also resulted in urban overcrowding and poor conditions for urban industrial workers (as mentioned above). In one 1904 survey, it was found that an average of sixteen people shared each apartment in Saint Petersburg, with six people per room. There was also no running water and piles of human waste were a threat to the health of the workers. The poor conditions only aggravated the situation, with the number of strikes and incidents of public disorder rapidly increasing in the years shortly before World War I.

Character Profile: Peasants

Source 1:

Roughly 85% of the Russian people were peasants, under harsh oppression from the upper classes and the Czarist regime. A small class of noble landowners controlled a vast number of indentured peasants. In 1861, Czar Alexander II of Russia emancipated these peasants [freed them, ending serfdom in Russia] not for moral reasons, but because it was preventing Russia from advancing socially. This newfound freedom was of limited use, however, since they now had no land to work. As a result, the government drafted new terms that gave the peasants set amounts of land to cultivate. However, the amount of land they were given was insufficient, thus mass riots broke out.

Source 2:

In order to consolidate his autocratic rule, Czar Nicholas II had attempted to remove the discontent of the peasants by adopting some agrarian reforms.

The peasants were discontented with the insufficient amount of land they received during the Emancipation of the Serfs in 1861.

Shortly after the 1905 Revolution, the Czar cancelled the redemption dues. When Stolypin became the Prime Minister in 1906, he abolished the communal system. In each village community, the peasants could take their own share of land as their private property. The more able peasants were allowed to buy additional land from the less able peasants.

The agrarian reform of 1906 pleased the more able peasants but not the less able peasants. The less able peasants, because of their poor management of their land, were often forced to give up their land as years went by. These landless peasants were ready to take part in any revolutionary outbreaks if they came.

Source 3:

Food had become a considerable problem in Russia, but the cause of this did not lie in any failure of the harvests, which had not been significantly altered during war-time. The indirect reason was that the government, in order to finance their efforts in WWI, had been printing off millions of rouble notes, and by 1917 inflation had sent prices up to four times what they had been in 1914. The peasantry were consequently faced with the higher cost of purchases, but made no corresponding gain in the sale of their own produce, since this was largely taken by the middlemen on whom they depended. As a result they tended to hoard their grain and to revert to subsistence farming.

Character Profile: Soldiers

Source 1:

When the Czar himself acted as the commander-in-chief in the field in 1915 [during WWI], more battles were lost. The Czar was in fact ignorant of military affairs and gave wrong advice in military strategy. Terrible human losses were recorded. By late 1915, casualties reached 3,800,000 (in 1917 Russian casualties were 9,750,000). As a result of heavy defeats and losses of lives, Russia's position was already hopeless by 1916. Defeatism grew rapidly among the army and there was mass desertion from the army.

Source 2:

In 1915, things took a critical turn for the worse when Nicholas decided to take direct command of the army, personally overseeing Russia's main warfront and leaving his incapable wife Alexandra in charge of the government. By the end of October 1916, Russia had lost between 1.6 and 1.8 million soldiers, with an addition two million prisoners of war and one million who had gone missing, which likely did little for the army's morale. Mutinies began to occur, and in 1916 reports of fraternizing with the enemy started to circulate. Soldiers went hungry and lacked shoes, munitions, and even weapons. Rampant discontent lowered morale, only to be further undermined by a series of military defeats. Nicholas was blamed, and what little support he had left began to crumble.

Source 3:

Casualty rates were the most vivid sign of this disaster. Already, by the end of 1914, only five months into the war, around 390,000 Russian men had lost their lives and nearly 1,000,000 were injured. Far sooner than expected, scarcely trained recruits had to be called up for active duty, a process repeated throughout the war as staggering losses continued to mount. The officer class also saw remarkable turnover, especially within the lower levels, which were quickly filled with soldiers rising up through the ranks. These men, usually of peasant or worker backgrounds, were to play a large role in the politicization of the troops in 1917.

The huge losses on the battlefields were not limited to men. The army quickly ran short of rifles and ammunition and, by mid-1915, men were being sent to the front bearing no arms. It was hoped that they could equip themselves with the arms that they recovered from fallen soldiers, of both sides, on the battlefields. With patently good reason, the soldiers did not feel that they were being treated as human beings, or even as valuable soldiers, but rather as raw materials to be squandered for the purposes of the rich and powerful.

